¹ To avoid simply repeating arguments already addressed in its response, Uniloc does not address every argument raised in Google's reply. By not addressing every issue in this sur-reply, Uniloc is not waiving any argument raised in its response. Uniloc is not conceding, for example, that nexus is required by the venue statute. Rather, the issue has already been addressed by Uniloc's response and need not be addressed again.

I. GOOGLE'S CHALLENGE TO CONSTITUTIONAL STANDING FAILS.

Google's reply brief fails to salvage Google's challenges to constitutional standing. Google cannot get around the simple fact that [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] Even if it could, [REDACTED]
[REDACTED]

A. The new cases cited in Google's reply do not hold that parties to an [REDACTED] may not mutually agree to terminate the license.

Google is unable to cite a single case holding parties to an [REDACTED] cannot mutually agree to terminate that license. Uniloc's response cites ample authority to the contrary, showing that [REDACTED] prevents unilateral revocation of an agreement by one party, not a mutual termination by the parties. See Resp. at 4-5. Uniloc's response also points out that the cases cited in Google's motion support the same principle. Id. Google's reply abandons the cases cited in its motion and cites several new cases, but Google's new cases fare no better than its old ones.

The case on which Google's reply primarily relies, Nano-Proprietary, did not involve an "issue similar to that here," as Google claims. Rather (like those cited in Google's motion), it involved one party's attempt to unilaterally terminate an irrevocable agreement based on a material breach by the other party. Nano-Proprietary, Inc. v. Canon, Inc., 537 F.3d 394, 399 (5th Cir. 2008) ("Nano argued before the district court that Canon breached the PLA when it permitted SED to use the licensed patents. Because of this breach, Nano sought termination of the PLA.") (emphasis added). The court found Nano could not unilaterally terminate the agreement "notwithstanding a material breach of the agreement" by the other party. Id. The other cases cited out of context in Google's string cite also did not find parties to an irrevocable agreement were prevented from mutually terminating it.¹ Indeed, none of the cases even involved an irrevocable agreement or a mutual termination of such an agreement.² There simply is no authority to support Google’s position. Instead, courts have rejected the very argument Google makes, finding it “stretch[e] credulity” and ignores the basic principle of contract law that parties to an agreement are free to mutually reform that agreement. Reply at 4-5.

Google's statutory standing arguments are baseless. Even if they had merit, the solution to a lack of statutory standing is joinder, not dismissal.

III. VENUE IS PROPER.

Venue is proper in this District because Google has committed acts of infringement here and has a regular and established place of business here.

A. Google's GGC servers and the place they occupy are regular and established places of business of Google.

Regarding the November Cases, Google has already admitted the GGC servers are regular and established places of Google if this Court applies the same analysis it applied in SEVEN and in Super Interconnect. See Resp. at 13-14. Google argues for the first time in its reply that [REDACTED] as a reply to Uniloc's response is unconvincing since the allegations on which it is based were known to Google before Google filed its motion. Even considering this new argument, it should be rejected for the reasons articulated in SEVEN and Super Interconnect.

Regarding the December Cases, the GGC serves were also regular and established places of Google as of the date of filing. Google now admits that after the GGC servers were drained on November 23, 2018, [REDACTED]

C. The [REDACTED] is a regular and established place of business of Google.

Google does not dispute that the [REDACTED] is a physical place, that it is regularly established, or that it is a place of business. It disputes only whether it is "Google's place of business." Reply at 11. Google does not dispute th [REDACTED]

D. Uniloc adequately alleged acts of infringement.

Google's reply claims it described how Uniloc failed to adequately allege acts of infringement and criticizes Uniloc for responding with broad legal arguments. The broad legal arguments in Uniloc's response are, however, rebuttals to the same broad legal errors contained in each of Google's motions where Google claims Uniloc failed to adequately allege infringement. Google does not meaningfully respond to these arguments in its reply. Google does not, for instance, provide any legal support for its erroneous claim that pre-suit knowledge is required for induced or contributory infringement. It is not. See Resp. at 27.

Google claims that prior complaints, which were later dismissed, could not give it pre-suit knowledge because Rule 41(a) dismissals "render the proceedings a nullity and leave the parties as if the action had never been brought." Reply at 16. A Rule 41(a) dismissal makes the prior proceedings a legal nullity; it does not erase events that occurred in the past. Uniloc does not point to the prior lawsuits as evidence of any legal effect of those proceedings. Rather, they demonstrate the fact that Google had pre-suit knowledge – a fact Google does not deny. To the extent necessary, Uniloc is willing to amend its complaints to specifically mention the prior cases that gave Google pre-suit knowledge but sees little purpose in requiring such a formality given the fact of Google's undisputed pre-suit knowledge.¹¹

¹¹ See e.g., IOENGINE, LLC v. PayPal Holdings, Inc., CV 18-452-WCB, 2019 WL 330515, at *4 (D. Del. Jan. 25, 2019) ("The Court sees no purpose that would be served by the formality of requiring IOENGINE to file an amended complaint in order to be allowed to assert knowledge of the patents during the period following the filing of the original complaint.").
